Fish stocks facing extinction: report

Canadian Press

HALIFAX -- Many fish stocks throughout the world could face near extinction by 2050 if more isn't done to stem the increasing strain on most species, especially those in deep waters.

That is according to a report that will be released today.

The article, to be published in Science Magazine, says authorities must try to contain a trend that has trawlers venturing further offshore.

The study says those trawlers are destroying fish habitats as they search for large species.

Daniel Pauly, one of the article's authors, says that over the last 50 years the international fishery has moved into deeper waters -- a trend that could foreshadow stock losses similar to what happened to the cod in Canada.
